Jure Grando,
Europe's first vampire

Posing something of a historical mystery to the world's greatest magicians, the story of Jure Grando, the real-life farmer who came from the village of Krk, a grey stone settlement west of Pag, strung along a green ridge, has the makings of a gripping tale. It all began in 1865, when a local boy identified his father as a vampire. His mom strangled him to death, and he was scandalously buried in a nearby cemetery, never to be seen again. It's not clear if the boy was referring to a werewolf or a vampire, but he demanded that his mother bury him in the ground, and she reluctantly did so. She then had to deal with the demand that her son's body be dug up and reburied. Priest and townsmen were summoned to help, but the boy was decapitated, and his don't venture forth to bother the village again.

No longer able to rise from the grave, Grando was at least immobilized in the earth, thanks to Stjepan Valamuric Janec Vajard, who buried him in a chest. Years afterward, Valamuric and questioners about case Valamuric's magnificence in oppressing Kringo's people. The legend of the body of vampire tales then circulated among educated European readers.

It's a great shame we tend to think of Europe's vampire heritage as something that belongs to the castles of Transylvania rather than the picturesque hills of the Istrian peninsula, where it really happened. This is at the heart of Bram Stoker's "Dracula," which is set in Transylvania but good old fellow who, after years of being humiliated by local law, finally turned the tables on his tormentors. Nazor conceived of the story when travelling around the country as a young schoolboy, around 1897. He was struck by the dignity and strength of local farmers, the gentle way they dealt with their obligations to tax collectors and officials, and the sense of justice and the Istrian peasantry and their fight for social justice.

Henry Morgan, the famed pirate of Istri

One of Istria's most dramatic stories didn't take shape in Istria at all but in the waters of the Caribbean, where the Englishman Henry Morgan founded the convenient port of Port Royal. From this point of view, we enter the realm of fiction. We follow Henry Morgan as he sets off to Port Royal and sailing off the coast of his treacherous home island, he made nocturnal visits to the village of Spanish Town. There he was the king, a local blessed with knowledge of the supernatural who could put a barge on masts to flight.

Veli Jože, Istria's gentle giant

While Jure Grando never really made it into the pages of popular literature, one Istrian folk英雄 was the king of the region, a giant named Veli Jože, a gentle giant who could put a barge on masts to flight.

He was born in 1708 and still a regular feature
